The Year of the Red Fox

fox hunts, so they brought more over to augment the native population. Records indicate red fox were brought into the New England and Mid-Atlantic settlements in the late 1700s, to support the hunting habits of settlers. Today the red fox can be found in almost every area of New Jersey, including some of the more urban areas. Our resident red fox, Digger, came to us after being hit by a car in Camden.

While Digger no longer has use of one of his rear legs due to the injuries he sustained, he is a great example of how adaptable and intelligent these animals are.

We are now running a small but vital fund-raising campaign exclusively to help us care for these adorable babies. We need to build a new, specially-designed enclosure to enable us to raise the kits until they are old enough to be released back to the wild. I ask that you please consider helping us to help them with a donation towards this effort.

You can find videos of the fox kits on our Facebook page! Keep tuning in as we update it weekly. —Jeanne Gural

“Santa Bob” is at it again!

IN APRIL, OUR GENEROUS “GUARDIAN OF THE WILD”, Bob Aaronson helped us to secure a brand new Ford F150 longbed pickup truck. We have increased its visibility on the road with the addition of our familiar Cedar Run “Foxface” logo on both door panels and, of course, the “Foxtail” symbol on the tailgate!

Special thanks go to Holman Ford of Maple Shade for their help and support in this process. Many thanks also for the donation of the graphics by Vic Gorin, owner of Precision Sign Works. www.vinylgrafx.com

Raining Baby Owls! Every animal brought to the Refuge has a unique story.

IF YOU’VE RECENTLY SEEN A GHOSTLY FIGURE, clad in a dirty white sheet and a pillowcase hood with cut-out eye-holes, streaking through the grounds of Cedar Run, you’ve not encountered the ghost of Christmas past or some time-lapsed trick or treater looking for a hand out. No...you’ve run into Stephanie Stewart, Cedar Run’s Wildlife Rehabilitation Director otherwise known as the Owl Nanny.

Stephanie, who can rarely be found in anything but jeans and a t-shirt, created this clever disguise so our latest wildlife patients would not become too accustomed to their human nursemaids and begin to think of them as their parents.

During early critical periods of a baby animal’s life they may imprint on those caring for them (even when the objects of this care are not their parents) making a future release into the wild a precarious proposition.

On a crisp, windy day in late March, a thickly-downed, 10-day old baby great horned owl was brought to the Cedar Run rehab hospital. Though the baby appeared to be in relatively good health, it had a wound on its back. After some tender-loving care the baby owl recovered from its injury and it was decided to attempt to place him back into the nest from which he had fallen. But when Cedar Run staff was unable to locate the family who had brought in the baby owl, a new plan was needed. It was decided instead to place our new little guest with one of our resident great horned owls. JJ—who had been used as an owl mother surrogate in the past—was always happy to hang out with these cute little additions to her enclosure, but refused to feed them. She thought that was our job. So, dressed in a white sheet and a pillow-case, with an owl puppet on her hand, Stephanie twice daily slipped into JJ’s enclosure

The Year of the Red Fox

IN ADDITION TO THE HUNDREDS of baby birds, squirrels and rabbits we take in and treat, each year our wildlife rehab team seems to experience trends in the animals we see coming in. One year we could see more groundhogs than usual, the next we could see more shore birds. Some of this is due to oscillating population levels, some of it due to construction or displacement in certain areas, and some of it is just happenstance. As we were preparing for both our electronic and paper newsletters, I wrote a story titled “The Year of the Owlet”, due to our team treating or re-nesting eight great horned owlets in a span of about eight days. But then we took in six red fox kits, then one more, then six more, including a nursing mother.

We now have 14 fox; six littermates who lost their mother, a single lost kit and a Mother with her five kits. The single lost kit joined the orphan group, and we are keeping the Momma and her kits together in a separate area. Then we got a heartbreaking call about a fox kit that was sleeping next to his mother who had been killed. He was there for at least a few days, without food, without water. The rest of his littermates were gone, we do not know where, but this little guy luckily made it here.

After his quarantine period, we hope to have him join the Momma fox and her kits, so he will once again have a family. So what we thought was going to be the year of the owlet, quickly turned into the year of the red fox.

There are two species of fox found in New Jersey, the red fox (Vulpes vulpes) and the grey fox (Urocyon cinereoargenteus). The history of the red fox in New Jersey is a complicated one, like many of us. While the grey fox naturally occurs throughout North America, there is some dispute as to whether the red fox naturally occurred here or if it was introduced by European settlers. Turns out, both scenarios may be true. The red fox may have been native to the area since the species is found throughout North America, including Canada. However, it is also likely that the red fox were not found in the numbers the European settlers would need for their

Help us help the animals: The Annual Trustee's Appeal

OUR ANNUAL TRUSTEE'S APPEAL WILL BE ARRIVING IN MAILBOXES THIS SUMMER. Each year our Board of Trustee's runs this appeal to ensure Cedar Run has the funds we need to keep our resident animals fed and healthy and the refuge moving forward. If you have not renewed your membership, we encourage you to do so. It truly takes a village to run a refuge and we cannot do so without you.

and held out pieces of dead mice to the baby owl. JJ looked on serenely, glad it wasn't her responsibility to keep this little critter well fed!

Just as JJ and the baby owl began to bond, Cedar Run received a call about a new baby owl that had fallen from a nest. It seemed another rehabber had picked up an additional baby from this same location but felt it wasn't appropriate to try and return the owl to the nest because it had serious injuries. Recognizing an opportunity, rehab staff came up with a plan. Since the owl parents believed they have two owls to tend to, maybe they wouldn't notice that one was not actually their own!

After checking out the new owlet and making sure it wasn't injured, the baby owls were put together. Staff placed nesting material (leaves and sticks) in a laundry basket and then returned with the owlets to the location of the original nest. After using a ladder to reach the lowest branches of a tall white pine tree, Stephanie, an avid rock climber, pulled herself from branch to branch, until she had ascended thirty feet into the air. After hoisting up the laundry basket nest with the owlets inside, she carefully secured the basket to the sturdy limbs of the pine tree. Within minutes of being placed back in the tree, the baby owls begin to cluck. Stephanie, noticing the curious parents circling overhead, made a fast descent.

Several days later Cedar Run received a call from the family who was watching over the nest. One of the babies was back on the ground! Stephanie quickly returned and after checking out the fallen owl for injuries, hoisted him back up into the nest. While up in the tree she saw that the nest included pieces of dead rabbits and mice, a clear sign that the parents were feeding the owlets.

Not long after, another distress call came into Cedar Run. "We have two baby owls on the ground. It looks like their nest has fallen out of the tree. Can you help?" Before the phone was back in the receiver, rehab staff was in the basement collecting a laundry basket to build another owl nest!
